Lying immediately south of Luzon is a group of seven islands, varying in size from that of Rhode Island to that of Connecticut, and known collectively as the Visayan Archipelago. It constitutes the second division of the Philippines, and has a combined area about half as large as Luzon.